among corner businesses.

A common trait among the buildings are regulating lines that lead into the entrance. Although there are very few regulating lines that run from building to building, all of the buildings have them. Throughout Alberta St. different buildings have found unique ways to use regulating lines. Some buildings use corrugated siding running perpendicular to the doorway to announce the entrance. Another strategy that has been used are extended window sills.

Perhaps the most important guideline to follow is that every business must add its own unique interpretation to the these rules. Every building entrance has a unique quality that draws people inside whether it be using unique building materials, establishing the entrance in an original orientation, or creating a threshold that encourages an individual experience. These are the things that give Alberta St. such rich flavor. If future builders, and owners can adhere to these unwritten guidelines, than Alberta St. will surely flourish in the manner that it is meant to.
